I GOT A BIRD THAT WHISTLES...

by Andy Longo

FLAGEOLET

SERINETTE -->

When Bob Dylan sang about having a bird that whistles and a bird that sings, it was a melancholy tune about unrequited love. However in the eighteenth century, such words might have been an introduction to a tune most prideful. There was a fascination with songbirds at that time. Consider that most birds are born with the sounds they make. Only four of the twenty-three major groups learn to make their sounds. These include the songbirds, parrots, hummingbirds, and lyrebirds.

Birds sing for natural reasons; to communicate within their species, to establish territory, and apparently for the joy of it. When a nightingale hears a tawny owl, one of its major predators, it may tend to silence for a bit, but then return to singing. Unique to every bird is a vocal organ called a syrinx located at the base of the trachea and in many birds is as small as a raindrop. It is an organ capable of making two sounds at once.

While songbirds are prolific singers, they do not sing in the harmonic scale devised by humans. The golden weaver has been known to sing in the pentatonic scale. That is, until humans became involved with songbirds in eighteenth century Germany and France. At that time, individuals sought to train songbirds to sing and to enter into competitions for which lavish prizes were awarded. There was no recorded music available for training so two instruments were used to produce melodies literally "for the birds". One was a high pitched flute called a flageolet and the other was a small barrel organ called a serinette.

There is an anecdote from the 1930s in which a New South Wales farmer maintained a lyrebird as a pet. He would play his flute often near the bird. The bird learned only to sing a short fragment of one of his tunes, and he decided it best to let the bird have its freedom. Thirty years later, it was observed in the area that the lyrebirds were singing songs with flute like characteristics!

COMPILATION OF BIRDS SONGS

When I was a young man adrift upon the Dales
 I met a girl beside the bridge across the River Swale
 Her forebears roamed the Cotswolds and held the Normans there
 There was Saxon fire deep in her eyes, and Dog-Rose in her hair.

Sixteen generations since the brothers went to sea
 Richard fought the Spanish fleet off Plymouth and Torquay
 John set sail for America in a cold Southampton rain
 And though it's been four hundred years their blood runs in my veins.

CHORUS

When I was an old man I walked the long way home
 With memories as yellow as a wall of Sherbourne stone.
 The Old Bridge Inn at Topsham was my refuge from the air
 Though the Queen once called within those walls I found a welcome there.

Though the Queen once called within those walls I found a welcome there.
